National Historic Landmarks

A Preservation Program of the National Park Service

Americans have long treasured their cultural heritage. Among the most carefully authenticated treasures of that heritage are the national historic landmarks designated by the Secretary of the Interior for exceptional significance in the Nation's history. These treasures include such diverse places as the United States Capitol Building; ruts on the Oregon Trail—silent reminders of the trek of westward pioneers; Fair Lane, the home of Henry Ford, who launched America into the mass production industrial age; the quiet rural valley of Green Springs, Virginia.

The National Historic Landmarks Program takes its roots from the Historic Sites Act of 1935 which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to "make a survey of historic and archeological sites, buildings, and objects for the purpose of determining which possess exceptional value as commemorating or illustrating the history of the United States;" and to "Erect and maintain tablets to mark or commemorate historic or prehistoric places and events of national historical or archeological significance." Initially, sites were surveyed to locate places which might be considered for inclusion in the National Park System. This remains a responsibility of the National Survey of Historic Sites and Buildings. In 1960, however, there was a realization that a vast majority of our total cultural heritage, comprised of the man-made and natural environment, would for numerous reasons, never be included in the national park system. To identify such places of national significance, to mark them and to encourage private initiative in their preservation, the designation of national historic landmark was developed. This honorary program has received nationwide support for its catalytic role in stimulating preservation, community cooperation, and in giving national recognition to significant parts of the Nation's heritage.

National historic landmarks are visible reminders of the events, persons, places, and objects which have affected broad patterns of American history, illustrated man's craftsmanship and artistry, and reflected America's evolving culture. They contain historic and prehistoric villages of the American Indian, sites of battlefield conflict, homes of political leaders, soldiers, scientists, artists, and humanitarians. Leaders of business, labor, and education are also represented. The works of master architects and buildings which reflect outstanding examples of a particular period or style of architecture may be found. The diversity of landmarks reflects the whole of the American experience.

In recent years, districts, which possess a composite quality and evoke a special feeling and association, have been chosen as national historic landmarks. Such districts may contain individual buildings which, of themselves, may be of less than national significance, but as an assemblage, representing a special character of an urban or a rural environment, possess national significance.

To attain the designation of national historic landmark, a property must be studied by National Park Service historians, architects, or archeologists, usually as a part of a major theme in American history such as Social and Humanitarian Movements or Agriculture. The property should meet three general criteria: significance in a given field; association with individuals and events; and integrity, the latter meaning that original and intangible elements which contribute to national significance must remain intact. Potential landmarks are brought, semi-annually, before two advisory boards of scholars and national leaders—the Consulting Committee for the National Survey of Historic Sites and Buildings, and the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments. These boards review the presentations of National Park Service professionals. Those properties which meet the approval of the Secretary's Advisory Board are recommended for landmark status.

The actual designation is effected when the Secretary of the Interior, acting upon the counsel of his Advisory Board, approves landmark designation. The National Historic Landmarks Program is the only honorary preservation program of its kind in the Nation.

In administering the program, the National Park Service cooperates with educational institutions throughout the land, State and municipal governments, organizations such as the National Trust for Historic Preservation, and private individuals.

After landmark designation, the owner of a property may voluntarily agree to preserve the integrity of the landmark. Landmark owners are entitled to receive, free of charge, a certificate signed by the Director of the National Park Service and the Secretary of the Interior and a bronze marker which can be displayed on the property. Such participation is voluntary and does not affect landmark status which becomes official upon designation by the Secretary. Of 1,349 national historic landmarks, well over half the owners have chosen to display their plaques and to make a commitment to preserve their properties. In itself, landmark designation does not legally bind the owner with respect to the use of the property. However, should the owner significantly change or destroy the values for which a property was recognized as being nationally significant, the Secretary of the Interior could withdraw the honor of landmark designation and reclaim the plaque and certificate.

Many owners of national historic landmarks, assisted by the National Park Service, plan impressive dedication ceremonies, centering around the presentation of the certificate and plaque. In some instances the certificate is presented by the Secretary of the Interior, and, on occasion, by the President of the United States. Such ceremonies often bring whole communities together to reflect upon the honor bestowed and to look to a future of cooperation in preserving the unique values—which brought about landmark designation.

Landmark designation enables the Nation to pay special honor to, and recognize individuals, sites, and buildings for their part in contributing to the American experiment. Identification of landmarks also enables Americans to learn more about the history of their country and to gain a greater appreciation of the sacrifices of those who have gone before them.

For the individuals, institutions, historical societies, and public authorities who own or administer national historic landmarks, there is a personal satisfaction that the property has been duly recognized—and that its history and features will be recorded for posterity. National historic landmarks are automatically listed in the National Register of Historic Places. Some landmarks, which contain buildings, may have them architecturally studied and measured by the Historic American Buildings Survey—another preservation program of the National Park Service. These measured drawings are deposited in the Library of Congress to serve as a permanent record should the building be destroyed at some later time. The public may also read about the properties in the national historic landmark book series. Each volume contains an introductory narrative on a major theme and site descriptions of the landmarks. The books in this growing educational series are available from the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402.

Landmark status is not merely an honor conveyed to static brick and mortar or visible architectural features, but in a human way to those individuals whose courage and creativity made possible something which would one day have significance for the Nation. Thus, an owner-conservator may have a personal, as well as a community reason, for preserving a national historic landmark—both a testament to the past and a guidepost to the future.

The Secretary of the Interior, through the National Park Service, provides continuing counsel and advice on the preservation of our national historic landmarks—an irreplaceable national heritage.

Note on arrangement of entries

In this listing of the national historic landmarks, the following format is used. The historic name of the landmark is given with its location and the historic date or historical period involved. This is followed by a short statement on the significance of the property. The final date given is that on which the property was designated as a national historic landmark by the Secretary of the Interior.
